A dream realized

Inaugural class of Legacy Scholars graduates

This fall, Levertis Brown Jr. will be the first in his family to go to college, a feat he hopes will inspire his younger brother, sister and cousin to follow in his footsteps.

"I want my little sister and brother to look up to me and say, 'Oh, I want to get that,'" said Brown, an 18-year-old Battle Creek Central High School graduate. "It's just a great honor to show them how you're supposed to be successful."

Brown said he'll enroll at Kellogg Community College to study criminal justice. He wants to be a police offer, a member of a SWAT team.

But Brown said his mom is the only one working in his family, and it's unlikely he would've made it to college without a gift given to the community seven years ago with students just like him in mind.

Brown is among some 500 students from Battle Creek Public Schools and Lakeview School District who graduated this spring as the inaugural class of Legacy Scholars, beneficiaries of a W.K. Kellogg Foundation gift that guarantees them two free years of classes at KCC.

Beth Luckock, Legacy Scholars coordinator for the Battle Creek College Access Network, said more than 200 students have signed up to use the scholarship this fall.

The remaining students are going to four-year schools, have joined the military, or could use the scholarship later, she said. Students have up to five years after graduation to use Legacy funding.

The scholarship was created in 2005 when the Kellogg Foundation gave $4 million to send all of that fall's BCPS and Lakeview sixth-graders to KCC if they graduated from those districts. The foundation gave another $4 million in 2007 and last year the program was expanded to give at least some money to students who move into BCPS or Lakeview as late as their sophomore year.

KCC President Dennis Bona said his school usually enrolls about 150 students from the two Legacy districts, so the scholarship has realized its founders' dreams of sending more kids to postsecondary schooling. And Luckock said as much as half of this year's Legacy Scholars are first-generation college-goers.

Bona said students are far more likely to attend college if someone in their family has done so.

That's largely because students never exposed to college can have a difficult time navigating the application process, if they aren't too intimidated to try. But one of the biggest parts of Legacy Scholars has been working with the students the past six years on just how to traverse that system.

Katie Smyth is a Legacy Scholar who graduated from Lakeview High School. JOHN GRAP/THE ENQUIRER

In today's tough economy, the scholarship is important even to those who could've made it to college without it.

It helped Lakeview's Katie Smyth, 18, who said she wants to take two years at KCC before transferring to Michigan State University. She's not sure of her major, yet, but she's leaning toward food science and possibly starting a career here in the Cereal City.

Smyth's parents went to college; they're both teachers at BCPS. They have some money saved up and Smyth said she'd probably have gone to college even without the scholarship.

"But it probably would've been a lot harder to go for a higher degree without the scholarship," she said. "I want to get a master's degree, and this way I won't be as far in debt after."

Ditto for Sarah Marsh, another 18-year-old Lakeview grad. She said she wants to study medicine, and the Legacy scholarship "allows me to go further … It's really helpful."

Indebted college grads drag on local and national economies, the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau said recently, and that's just part of the reason local officials said Legacy Scholars helps more than just the scholarship recipients.

Bona said Legacy students are not using other local scholarships, freeing up those funds for other students to attend school. And research shows higher-educated people are likely to make more money, which means more to spend into the economy.

And finally, officials and students said the opportunity of Legacy Scholars makes the city a more attractive place to live, which could bring college graduates back home.

"I think it shows that Battle Creek really cares about their students and cares about their education and what they're going to do in the world," Marsh said.

Andrick Brown, an 18-year-old Lakeview grad unrelated to Central's Levertis Brown, said in a separate interview he agreed. Though he was accepted to Western Michigan University, Andrick Brown said he'll attend KCC to become a radiology technician, opening the doors for him to work a well-paying job while he finishes up medical school later on.

He said such opportunities are "going to bring a big breath of life into this city."
